Learning to Shoot with Both Eyes Open

Many shooters close or squint their weak eye when shooting. Doing so impairs peripheral vision and depth perception while increasing eye fatigue. Your transitions will be much quicker if you use both eyes, and you'll be more relaxed, which will improve your shooting in general. The problem is that the dominant eye is usually not much stronger than the weak eye, so instead of seeing one image strongly and the other faintly, you see both strongly. Focusing on the front sight, you see a confusing array of images, with no way to coordinate them.

It's impossible to sort out the double images every time you take a shot. Instead, train your eye to "know" a good sight picture and to ignore the extraneous elements. Within a few months, you can shoot as well as anyone, with complete peripheral awareness, by learning not to "see" any doubling of the sight picture.

The following is a recovery program for shooters with eye squinching problems:

Put a strip of scotch tape on your shooting glasses over your non-dominant eye and shoot with both eyes open. The tape will obscure the weak eye's view to the point where it won't interfere with your sight picture. Shoot this way until you've acquired the technique and your stance, sight focus, and follow through feel natural.

Dry fire every day. Start from the holster or low ready, whichever makes sense to you, and practice: first to make it smooth, then to make it perfect. Keep a strong front sight focus, and be very aware of where the sights are when the hammer falls. Work your way up to being able to make a presentation with your eyes closed, then opening your eyes to see a solid sight picture.

Replace the tape with a smear of Vaseline, thin enough you see a ghostly rear sight when focused on the front sight. It will disorient you, as you'll see two rear sights and two targets. You'll find that you're able to put the sight dead on the target regardless of the double vision. Continue the dry-fire regimen, and soon you'll hardly be aware of the second image. As you get more acclimated to seeing the sight picture with only the strong eye, you can remove more and more Vaseline.

Eventually, open both eyes. Watch the sight through recoil. You'll learn that you can follow the sight and retain a sharp picture, disregarding any weak-eye images. If your eyes begin to confuse the images, go back to the other glasses for a few minutes. In live fire, gradually phase out the old glasses.

Within a few months, you won't ever think about it again--your eyes will "know" the sight picture and the non-dominant image will seem like a peripheral, ghostly superposition. This is because attention is what makes the image strong. The steps above will allow you to shoot as if the conflicting image didn't exist--and the more you ignore it, the more it doesn't exist. The result is no visual confusion, just a strong sight picture, normal depth perception, and the full range of your natural peripheral vision.

Misfire, or ... ?

Most of us are familiar with misfires. A misfire is when you press the trigger, the hammer or firing pin falls, but the cartridge doesn't fire. But do you know what a "hangfire" is? That's when there's a noticeable delay between the time the hammer falls and the cartridge fires. It could be a fraction of a second or even several seconds.

If you have a misfire (which is always a potential hangfire), the correct thing to do is to keep the muzzle pointed downrange for some period of time. The NRA recommends 30 seconds.

Here's one reason why:

Dues Increase for 2013

CPF&G hasn't raised it's dues since 2002. Unfortunately, funds on hand and anticipated costs force us to do so this year. This action was voted on by the Members at the September meeting, after much discussion.

The primary reasons for the increase are this past summer's emergency foundation repairs on the clubhouse and the impending need to replace the Indoor Range backstop.

The backstop is only 1/4" steel plate, and forty years of constant pounding has taken its toll, to the point where even factory pistol rounds are beginning to punch holes in the countless welded patches.

If allowed to deteriorate any further, it could mean eventually closing the Indoor Range completely, an action so detrimental to the Club that we cringe just to think about it.

The replacement cost is likely to be in the area of $100,000, but we are looking into the feasibility of less expensive alternatives to a complete replacement.

Several Members are currently researching options, consulting with NSSF (The National Shooting Sports Foundation) and the NRA, both of whom offer advisory services on range construction, replacement, and repair.

We will meet and overcome this challenge! We will NOT allow the range to close!

Then again, if you complete 10 hours work at the Club before you renew, your dues will only go up $15.
