TURKEY SHOOT - NOVEMBER SATURDAY WORK PARTIES

Red Dots for Old Eyes

by Bryce M. Towsley - posted on NRA Shooting Illustrated.com, 28 March 2023

Red-dot sights on handguns are all the rage among the cool folks, but they are an even better solution for shooters with aging eyes.

It has happened against my will and without my permission, but I got old; parts of me did anyway. I first noticed it in my late 40s when I had trouble reading the headstamp on a cartridge. It's called presbyopia and it refers to the loss of ability to see close objects or small print. Development of presbyopia is a normal process that happens slowly over a lifetime. Most people usually first notice it around age 40.

Once my arms got too short, I got reading glasses. I am lucky that, in my late 60s, Mart-Store glasses are still all I need for reading or doing gunsmithing. But, shooting was different. Pistol sights kind of ended up in "no-man's land" in terms of distance from the eye.

I solved it for many years by getting prescription glasses that allowed my focus on the front sight. I borrowed a "blue" training gun from Smith & Wesson and brought it to my eye doctor. He is a bird hunter, so he understood—sort of—but his staff didn't. Once we calmed them down and canceled the SWAT team, he measured my eyes and wrote the prescription. As I shoot handguns left-handed and long guns right-handed (it's a long story), I had the correction only in the left side of the shooting glasses.

Then, over the years that aging thing advanced. I never told it that it could and it didn't ask permission, it just did it. Years later, I found that seeing the sights in low-light conditions became quite difficult, even with the glasses. So, I put an Aimpoint Micro red-dot on my Smith & Wesson Model 22A for indoor bullseye shooting. What a difference it made.

I am not exactly a red-dot rube. Aimpoint introduced the first one in 1975, and shortly afterward I mounted one of them on my Ruger Super Blackhawk .44 Magnum. I shot my first black bear and several whitetails with that handgun back when Reagan was running the ship. (Damn, I miss him.) I have used red-dot sights on rifles, pistols, and handguns for hunting here, Europe, and Africa.

The manufacture of all red-dot sights requires dust-free areas when assembling optics. Precise placement of adjustment turrets is necessary, as is that of the diode/emitter to ensure accuracy. While MRDS sights use smaller emitters to project the dot, they need to be just as rugged as a full-size dot sight in order to safely withstand the forces of a reciprocating slide.

I have recently put red-dot sights on a few rifles by using mounts from Skinner Sights or Turnbull Restorations, which fit in the rear-sight dovetail. This puts the sight a significant distance from the eye; red-dot reflex sights work great as they require no permanent modification to the rifle. I have some old classics that I have not used in a long time back in the game. I have red-dots on several AR and AK style rifles, including those I designated for self-defense. Nothing is faster for the first shot or for multiple targets with a rifle. In fact, red-dots let me get back to shooting my AK rifles, as the abomination they call iron sights on that platform are too small for my aging eyes.

Many of my serious hunting handguns wear red-dot sights. They are really the best choice. Traditional scopes have issues with eye relief and parallax that make them difficult to use on a handgun. Iron sights are a relic from my youth unless I have my glasses on, which restrict normal vision and are a no-go for hunting. Red-dots are fast, accurate and work well with handguns, as they are not sensitive to eye relief.

Red-dots are not only on my serious, big-bore revolvers. I have them on several semi-automatic handguns as well, including a custom .357 SIG with a Trijicon RMR that I carry in a Kenai holster from Gunfighters, Inc. It's my carry gun while fly fishing. For the record, the sight appears to be waterproof as it has fallen in the river more than once. Seems you get clumsy as you age, too.

Many of today's firearm manufacturers offer handguns that are either optic-compatible with plates or can have optical sights added by a gunsmith to provide enhanced precision when engaging targets at either close or extended distances.

This style of sights have long been a big part of my shooting, but not so much on competition, or more importantly, defensive handguns. For years, I didn't think the technology was there yet for my carry gun. However, we are closing in on half a century of red dots in the marketplace, and a lot has changed. If anything, I am behind the curve here. Red-dots have become small and very reliable. Things have shifted, and red-dot sights on defensive handguns are on the way to becoming the norm.

I had tried shooting a few handgun matches in the past with red-dot-sighted handguns, but became so frustrated that I stopped using them. I practiced before the matches, but not enough. With the added stress of the match timer, things fell apart.

After shooting indoor bullseye during the winter, I made the decision to use only handguns equipped with red-dot sights for the next year. That forced me to work through the difficulties that had stalled me in the past from using the electronic sights on serious competition or carry guns.

There is a learning curve with the change to red-dot sights. At the range, I kept hearing from folks (who thought they were helping) about how it's hard to acquire the dot on a handgun at speed. They weren't lying. It should be instinctive to a long-time shooter, but it was not. It seemed like I had to hold the handgun at a much different angle to see the dot. It's probably because the sight is higher over the bore than iron sights. I would punch the gun to the target and the dot was never there. I had to angle the gun so it seemed to me like I was shooting at the bottom of the target. After years of shooting with iron sights, it was a difficult transition. I have colleagues who insist that muscle memory is not a real thing, but it is and, in this case, it was working against me.

Still, I had committed myself to making it work. Some of the best shooters I know use red-dot-equipped handguns, so it's not like I was plowing virgin ground. I have watched my friend Jerry Miculek do amazing things with a red-dot-sighted handgun. Clearly, the problems of the past were with me. By committing to using only red-dot handguns, I thereby forced myself to learn the system.

While spending time in the outdoors, an MRDS-equipped 1911 chambered in 10 mm provides adequate terminal performance for potential predators weighing less than 300 pounds. The MRDS fitted to the author's P365X helps makes up for a subcompact semi-auto's shortcomings.

How did I do it? By fitting a Leupold DeltaPoint Pro to my SIG Sauer P320 X-Five handgun and designating that my "shooting gun" for the foreseeable future. I was running a Tuesday night pistol league at my local club that had diminished in numbers due to ammo cost and shortages. Fewer shooters opened some options to different drills. Those of us still there were all serious shooters, and I could set up complex and difficult scenarios. I am a Type-A competitive person and I didn't like losing these makeshift matches to folks who had never beaten me before. But, the red-dot was proving difficult to master at first. It would have been easy enough to return to my custom 2011 with its iron sights and perfect trigger, but I stuck with my commitment. I did a lot of dry practice in my office.

It crept up on me rather slowly, until one day I realized I was shooting pretty well. Better, in fact, than I was before I switched to the red-dot. I started placing high in local matches and winning more than my share.

Red-dots are great on a .22 LR for competition, or just plinking, as depicted by the author's Smith & Wesson 22A (far left) with an Aimpoint Micro sight and a Ruger 22/45 paired with a Vortex Venom RDS (left). For those with means for highly customized handguns, this Mag-na-Port revolver with a Trijicon SRO (right) is an ideal choice for the woods.

The red-dot sight allows me to keep my focus on the target, something I could never do with conventional sights. I simply look at the target and, when I correctly point the gun, the red dot is floating in my vision. It is simple enough to center it on the target and pull the trigger. This is a good safety tool in a carry gun, because you can focus on the bad guy the entire time. This means less chance of a misunderstood or missed movement.

With the right type of mount, the addition an red-dot sight can breathe new life into a rifle with otherwise hard-to-see irons.

I started shooting handguns at 18. I had fast reflexes and outstanding vision back then. So, to compare it to 67-year-old reflexes and eyes is not apples and oranges; it's more like apples and mud-pies. But, I can say that I am faster now with a red-dot sight on my handgun than I have been in recent years with irons. Not just first on target, but during target transitions. I can now look for the next target without worrying about front-sight focus. Find the target and dot and fire. In years past I had to shift focus back to the front sight, or miss. It takes a fraction of a second, but that adds up. I felt confident enough shooting red-dots on my handguns that several months into the process, I made the leap to a defensive handgun with a red-dot.

Those of us of a certain age know too well about the wear and tear from the hazards of living an active life and how it takes a toll. My back no longer appreciates a heavy handgun on my belt all day. I looked for a lighter alternative for a carry gun. That search ended with acquiring a SIG Sauer X Series P365 fitted with one of its Romeo Zero red-dot sights. It has a built-in rear sight and the gun is fitted with an X-Ray3 night sight in front, so you can co-witness the irons with the optic. I know—it's a 9 mm and if you read my articles you know in spite of the current fads, I am not a fan for defensive use. But, this gun is perfect in every other aspect. So, I dragged myself, kicking and screaming into the modern world of what I consider to be underpowered pistol cartridges.

Is it all fairy dust and unicorns? Not exactly. I have a slight astigmatism in my vision, which means I don't see a round dot. I have found ways to accommodate so it's not much of a problem for most shooting. The other thing is the red dot is not as precise. It's a big dot that covers a lot of target, so it's a factor in precision shooting when testing guns or ammo for accuracy.

Now, I have more shots in the X-Ring and I have tighter groups on the bullseye target with corrected vision, iron sights and good light. Red-dots allow me to keep shooting indoors (in low light) during our sadistically long Vermont winters. It cost me a few X-Ring hits, but so what? I am shooting, not at home wishing I was.

For every other use with a handgun, my aging eyes have found that a red dot has proven the better choice.

The Bill of No Rights

by State Representative Mitchell Kaye of Georgia

We, the sensible people of the United States, in an attempt to help everyone get along, restore some semblance of justice, avoid any more riots, keep our nation safe, promote positive behavior, and secure the blessings of debt-free liberty to our great-great-great-grandchildren, (and ourselves), hereby try, one more time, to ordain and establish some common sense guidelines for the terminally whiny, guilt-ridden, deluded, and other mentally weak folk who surround us.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that a whole lot of people are confused by the Bill of Rights and are so dim that they require a Bill of No Rights.

ARTICLE I

You do not have the right to a new car, a big screen TV, or any other form of wealth. More power to you if you can legally acquire them, but no one is guaranteeing anything.

ARTICLE II

You do not have the right to never be offended. This nation is based on freedom, and that means freedom for everyone - not just you! You may leave the room, change the channel, express a different opinion, etc., but the world is full of idiots, and probably always will be. Accept it.

ARTICLE III

You do not have the right to be free from harm. If you stick a screwdriver in your eye, learn to be more careful, do not expect the tool manufacturer to make you and all your relatives independently wealthy.

ARTICLE IV

You do not have the right to free food and housing. Americans are the most charitable people to be found, and will gladly help anyone truly in need, but we are quickly growing weary of subsidizing generation after generation of professional couch potatoes who achieve nothing more than the creation of another generation of professional couch potatoes.

ARTICLE V

You do not have the right to free health care. That would be nice, but from the looks of public housing, we're just not interested in public health care.

ARTICLE VI

You do not have the right to physically harm other people. If you kidnap, rape, intentionally maim, or kill someone, don't be surprised if the rest of us try to see you fry in the electric chair.

ARTICLE VII

You do not have the right to the possessions of others. If you rob, cheat, or coerce away the goods or services of other citizens, don't be surprised if the rest of us get together and lock you away in a place where you still won't have the right to a car, a big screen color TV, or a life of leisure.

ARTICLE VIII

You don't have the right to demand that our children risk their lives in foreign wars to soothe your aching conscience. We hate oppressive governments and won't lift a finger to stop you from going to fight if you want to. However, we are not required to parent the entire world and do not want to spend so much of our blood and money battling each and every little tyrant with a military uniform and a funny hat.

ARTICLE IX

You don't have the right to a job. All of us sure want you to have one, and will gladly help you along in hard times, but we expect you to take advantage of the opportunities of education and vocational training laid before you to make yourself useful.

ARTICLE X

You do not have the right to happiness. Being an American means that you have the right to freely pursue happiness - which, by the way, is a lot easier if you are unencumbered by an over abundance of idiotic laws created by those of you who were confused by the Bill of Rights.

Do you have the WILL to fight for your rights?

If you agree, I strongly urge you to forward this to as many people as you can. No, you don't have to, and nothing tragic will befall you should you not forward it. I just think it is about time common sense is allowed to flourish... call it the Age of Reason revisited.
